There's a running joke around the world of conservation that as long as savers are growing rich beyond their wildest dreams, the Earth will be ok. "We can always find more money to save the whales!" the thought goes. "It's like that... whale's... he's rich man's friend." So it is with the Greens. Last week in Australia they announced the new leader. The former poker-faced MP Jason Clare moved up to the top job because the party would be dead without him, and now he has a leading role in the Australian Government. You would think that Australians would be delighted with the Green party. Right now there are about 60 of them in the House of Representatives, as well as about 20 in the Senate. The party will become the third largest party in the nation if their candidate seats everything. In New Zealand, the Greens are the majority party in the House of Representatives, and are in coalition with the Labour Party. Their popularity has grown, at least in New Zealand, since the five Labour MPs joined forces with the Greens in the election last year. But overseas, the Greens' popularity seems to have reached a plateau. This is partly because of a deep sense of disappointment. When Gillard won the election in 2010, the Greens, under Tony Windsor, were in the opposition. They were gutted. They wanted the job of government. But it didn't happen. After six years of quarrelling - mostly f678ea9f9e
